DESCRIPTION

From 1976 to 1999, the animation technique of scratching directly on film has been the center of my cinematographic work. In year 2000, I left it behind to embrace the digital, convinced that I would never come back to it. The course of things is proving me wrong. Since about a year, I felt a strong need to resume my use of this technique. As I did not want to simply connect with where I had left seventeen years ago and redo the same kind of things I was doing at the time, I decided for an evolutionary process in order to redefine my approach to scratching. As a first step, in May 2016, I posted on Facebook a series of thirty scratched on film gif's, images that I recycled to make a film, Scratch, triptych-3, and also to develop a first video installation that was shown in January 2017 at Clark Center in Montreal, in the Hors-Pages group exhibition. Then, on April 6, there was a performance with musicians Malcolm Goldstein and John Heward presented at Cinémathèque québécoise, of which this installation was a direct consequence.

This work is articulated around the idea of «polyphony of flickers» that I got from a frame by frame analysis of the Norman McLaren's film Blinkity Blank, where I found a degree of complexity in the use of intermittent animation far beyond what I had expected. It is from this inspiration by the McLaren's art of flickers and also from the crude and physical manner of Len Lye in Free Radicals – those two filmmakers and those two films where early inspiration for me – that I envisioned this multifaceted project. The polyphonic idea is first developed at the level of the succession of discrete frames where different rate of flickering are superimposed to create complex rhythmic patterns. It also express itself through the juxtaposition of the three screens where loops of different lengths are endlessly running. The result is a constant lag between the three components and a constant recomposition between the images and the sounds. It would take 1291 days, about three years and a half, to return to the initial state of this looping setup. Thus it is impossible for anybody to watch the piece in its full length. In practice, it is a work without a beginning and an end, each spectator is bound to experience something totally singular. - Pierre Hébert

FURTHER INFORMATION

Technical needs : The installation is meant to be preferably shown with projection. Three projectors are needed. Three independant loops of different lengths, each with its own sound track, are to be projected. They must run independantly without synchronisation and the three soundtracks must be amplified and played separately. It is also possible to show them on three flat screens.
